

Please keep the internet neutral. The argument that non-neutrality will help drive innovation by making it easier for newcomers and small content-producers to get an audience seems completely phoney on the face of it. Non-neutrality would further empower the communications giants that already overcharge us and run essential monopolies at the expense of actual innovation and smaller entities. If you believe in free speech, you should also believe that everyone with a message that falls within the boundaries of permitted speech should have an equal opportunity to be heard. Doing away with net-neutrality is yet another way to weaken our democracy.
